Today the kids and I had the fortune to go downtown to meet with my Bishop and Stake President (a.k.a. my mom and dad), as well as my Primary teachers. We had a nice walk around the city, and I took a million photos. I also tried to get the kids into our new poses that I've been trying to get them into, but we're all still learning. I'm also really starting to look forward to the ward dance that I'm doing in December, especially since it's in the court of the Stake President. It should be so much fun, and I'm really looking forward to meeting everyone! Sorry about the tardiness of the post, I had to go put the kids down for a nap. :)Parents of children with developmental disabilities and their concerns in Hong Kong: a modified grounded theory study. A modified grounded theory approach was used to explore parents' concerns regarding the treatment of their children with developmental disabilities. A sample of 23 parents, who met a case definition of having a child with developmental disabilities was recruited using purposive and convenience sampling. Focus groups were used to collect data and data was analysed using constant comparative methods. Four super-ordinate categories emerged from the analysis: 'burdening', 'parental self-doubt', 'dissatisfaction' and 'outcome'. A 'new normal' for parents emerged from the findings, in which they viewed their child as different from others and often felt guilty for the child's difference. The psychosocial experiences
