I have an application where users can create groups of products (they can either add it to their own group or to a group created by another user). I'm currently in the process of optimizing the group creation page to make it faster, the page currently has a ton of calls to get items data from a MySQL database and then modify it to fit the group. The thing is, once the page is created, the data will not change. The data is a JSON object, and the only thing that should change is the name of the group (this is done by a simple textarea on the page). I could just do the one MySQL call, but since I'm parsing it in PHP to insert the data in the MySQL database I'm wondering if it would be more efficient to cache the results of this call in some way so that I can just modify the textarea on the page to update the data. The data has already been put into the database but I can't seem to find any simple way to access it, or I'm just not looking in the right place. Would anyone know of a way to do this? Maybe a simple PHP loop like the following, where $data contains the JSON data from the database: $value): $groupName = $_POST['group_name'][$key]; $sql = "UPDATE groups SET group_name='$groupName' WHERE id='$id'; //do something with the value endforeach; ?> A: As mentioned in my comment I just implemented this on my page. I use a simple array of names for the data, and so it's just a matter of looping through the array: $products = array(); $fetch_product = array('name' => '', 'id' => ''); 04aeff104c
